

Heart of a Woman

By Glenn Currier

Slender and humble in its youth the oak grew in moist earth near the bayou.
Roots pierced the dark land ate the rich gumbo silently morphed facets of soil into a heart with unexposed power and poise.

Across the bayou on a screened porch a young girl watched the new rain make puffs of dust in the dirt she daydreamed in the drifts of clouds and wondered where they were born.

A young man and his friend off the beaten path of their travels found the town pool swimming, he saw the beautiful girl perched above the deep end and across longitudes and latitudes of loving, laughing, and weeping they birthed and raised a family.

The bark's ridges and gaps reveal centuries of storms and floods the oak's long limbs laden with life, wisdom, and altered environments.

These two entwined lives enriched by learning and prodigious practice their wine a vintage of passionate enchantment imbibed by thirsty learners across decades beyond ordinary borders.

But she like the oak with open arms her strength born in good soil.
Hers is a rare power of gentle love hers a courage born of some cosmic connection at the heart of her beautiful humanity.

Dedicated to my cousin Melanie on her eightieth birthday. Both of us born in the Durand line in southern Louisiana not too far from the Evangeline Oak with lives seemingly divergent but somehow parallel and ultimately connected, I think, by a power greater than ourselves.
